Examples include the use of schedules to organize our schedules (e.g., teachers using student schedules to organize classroom activities), task list to organize our to-do list (e.g., a shopping list) or a calendar to organize our meetings and events. In order to facilitate the organization of information, organizers, such as organizers of task lists and calendar, were previously created using pre-defined templates which assist the users in creating different task lists or calendar presentations. Although the use of templates for creating organizers has been known, the creation of a template is a very time consuming process that can take hours to complete. Further, a user typically has to employ a separate application, such as, for example, Microsoft® Word, to perform other tasks. Consequently, this additional time consuming step further increases the overall process of creating a template and the time necessary for creating the organizer. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for methods and apparatus that enable users to create organizers and task lists without requiring them to employ a separate application to create the organizers and task lists. ♦s something about that. For me, it's not just that the audience is dying to see a different perspective — they're dying to see a different truth. When I work with artists who want to work in the family, or with people who work with a family dynamic, I just like the way these pictures have felt.” Then, of course, there is her current project, “All in Good Time.” It includes a documentary, three animated shorts, an essay and, most interestingly, an interactive installation. “I'm doing a project about storytelling that includes a digital book and a mixed-media installation called an interactive story wall,” she says. 82157476af
